Instructions for use
Prismatic compass

The compass consists of a metal housing and a metal sapphire lid with a glass window with the sighting line etched into it.

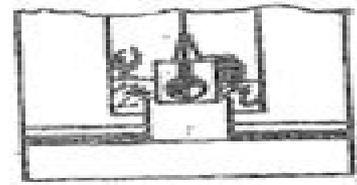

The spherically ground glass prism is mounted in a rubber-fingered housing that can be turned through 360°. This allows the prism to be moved into reading position and be folded back after use. The prism is attached to the compass housing by a vertical spring which enables it to move up and down by vertical movement using either thumb pressure or the focused hand screw (according to the model being used). This movement allows for sharp focusing which is achieved as follows:

Move the prism holder either up or down to the point where the graduated scale is readable with maximum sharpness. While doing so keep the compass exactly horizontal. This may be checked by using the integrated spirit-level.

When the prism is folded back the lid may be completely closed to protect it.

A 12 degree observation slit is provided above the prism. You can sight the objective slit to above the prism. The slit aligns the objective by simultaneously observing the slit. Enough the observation sighting line to the glass window. With some practice you will be able to read the direction of travel where the slit and sighting line are intersecting. Dist. sighting line and object will simultaneously appear in your field of vision when you hold the compass exactly horizontal.

The compass dial, or compass rose, has a sapphire bearing to ensure quick movement and optimal precision. Liquid damping prevents excessive oscillations of the magnetic needle, which is the case in conventional compass. The liquid filled chamber in the case is conventional compass. The liquid filled chamber in the capsule consists of highly transparent, bubble free plastic which does not contract when being exposed to extreme changes of temperature and of air pressure. In this case temporary air bubbles may occur which, however, do not affect the correct functioning of the compass. These bubbles are only a temporary phenomenon and will disappear again 24-to-48 hours, as soon as the compass is used again under normal conditions. The lid of the compass can be easily replaced by removing the screw on the base of the compass housing. Ensure that the foam pad is inserted again below the capsule.

The compass is provided with an integrated spirit-level. It can be secured on a tripod by means of the threaded fitting in the base and serve as theodolite for simple terrain surveys.

The prismatic compass offers you considerable advantages over those models being equipped with magnetic needle and wing mirror. Problems frequently caused by mirror reading and potential parallax errors are eliminated by prismatic reading. Excellent damping of the dial system ensures rapid and precise reading to the fraction of a degree.
