

Focus Group Guide for Reentry Program Evaluations

What is a focus group?

A focus group gathers information on a topic of interest by bringing people together for a facilitated discussion. Reentry program staff may use focus groups to assess the needs and strengths of their population or to get feedback on intervention design. Evaluators of reentry programs may use focus groups to inform the development of data collection instruments, to get formative information, or to understand quantitative findings.

In a focus group, a moderator guides the discussion and encourages communication between participants. This interaction makes it different from individual interviews; participants get to hear and comment on each other's answers to questions, and the group environment may shape what participants say. This format generates new data that might not have surfaced in a series of one-on-one interviews.

This planning guide is for reentry program evaluators who want to collect focus group data from program staff, participants, or stakeholders as part of their evaluation, and for program staff who want to better get feedback from their participants. It provides information on focus group staffing, logistics, protocols, and tips for successful facilitation.

Sample focus group goals for reentry program staff and evaluators:

- Hear from families welcoming home a loved one about their needs and resources before developing activities to best support them
- Speak to potential participants about whether they'd prefer group or individual counseling and why
- Before a staff survey gets administered, assess whether the survey questions truly capture the concepts of interest
- Capture participant feedback on what's working well and what's not helpful regarding job training
- Understand what might be contributing to the gender differences in program graduation rates

Logistics

A focus group usually lasts 60-90 minutes and includes from 6 to 10 participants. This group size allows time for everyone to share their insights while capturing different experiences and opinions. Ideally, focus group participants share characteristics that are valuable for answering research questions or providing feedback on how to improve the program. For example, suppose an outcome evaluation of a reentry program found that women have lower program success rates than others. In that case, the evaluator could bring together women participants in a focus group to shed light on what the barriers to successful participation were.

Staffing: There are two essential jobs during a focus group: a moderator and a note taker.

- The moderator leads the group from start to finish, keeping an eye on the time to ensure the conversation stays focused and all questions get answered in 60-90 minutes. The moderator stays mindful of group dynamics—encouraging participation and engagement from everyone, preventing anyone from dominating the discussion, asking for alternative viewpoints, and
