

Concrete Problems for Teachers

Many more mathematical statements are produced by the processes of being given an idea which is new with respect to previous mathematical statements than by the process of being given a statement.

Children and adults, that are familiar to your work, will naturally find it more difficult to give than to receive a process, even when children are given a statement. About children, especially, however, it is not clear whether giving a process is more difficult than giving a statement. This is a matter for research in learning of mathematics and perhaps, more generally, in learning of any subject. Considering the problem of learning to write a process in English, children may be given a statement.

1. A diagram is given and the children are to produce a statement which describes it. The diagram is given below. What two of these statements are correct and one statement is wrong? The statements are: (a) The diagram is a square. (b) The diagram is a circle. (c) The diagram is a triangle.

(a) What is the statement that is not correct?

(b) What is the correct statement?

(c) What happens if the statements are changed and you are given the diagram below?

2. A diagram is given and the children are to produce a statement which describes it. The diagram is given below. What two of these statements are correct and one statement is wrong? The statements are: (a) The diagram is a square. (b) The diagram is a circle. (c) The diagram is a triangle.

(a) What is the statement that is not correct?
