Why Not Say it Clearly Lester Snow King, 1978 Poor medical writing results from lack of training in writing skills and time to complete the work. The text is designed for medical students and physicians as a reference work or guide to lucid and pleasing writing. Modes of writing that hinder expression and suggestions for clear and agreeable writing of expository prose are discussed. The illustrative examples are either taken from English literature printed verbatim with bibliographic reference or from medical journals with suppressed references and changes to hinder article identification. Specific topics include editing, revisions, style analysis, dialects, and problems in translation, book reviews, and setting up a course in medical writing. The most pressing needs of good writing: flexibility, awareness of alternatives, judgement, and conscience are discussed.
