

Lab Exercise 7 - Cellular Respiration Anaerobic and Aerobic Metabolism

Introduction:

Cellular respiration occurs in most cells of both plants and animals. Cells must continually obtain energy from the environment and use it to make adenosine triphosphate or ATP. ATP is used later in cellular work. Cells may extract energy from organic food molecules such as carbohydrates, fats, and proteins. Cells do not breakdown molecules in a single reaction; instead, the breakdown occurs in a long sequence of reactions.

The two important pathways to extract energy from nutrients include aerobic respiration and anaerobic respiration (fermentation). Some organisms carry out their energy producing reaction in the complete absence of oxygen, a process known as anaerobic respiration. Fermentation is an anaerobic process because oxygen is not used in the process. Other organisms use oxygen in their metabolic process and are said to carry out aerobic respiration.

Objectives:

Upon completion of this exercise, you should be able to:

1. Explain cellular respiration in both aerobic and anaerobic respirations.
2. Understand the general reactions and products of aerobic respiration and fermentation.
3. Describe the stages for aerobic and anaerobic respirations
4. Describe the use of O<sub>2</sub> and the production of CO<sub>2</sub> in cellular respiration.
5. Explain the relationship between cellular respiration and photosynthesis.
6. Define all the terms that are bolded and underlined.

Cellular Respiration: (Figure 7.1):

Cellular respiration is the general term which describes all metabolic reactions involved in the formation of usable energy from the breakdown of nutrients. In living organisms, the "universal" source of energy is ATP.
