Anglo-Saxon England

The Anglo-Saxons were the first rulers of England in its modern form. The kings of this era ruled over a system of small communities that were arranged into tithes, hundreds and tithings. Local lords and communities were responsible for law and order in their own areas.

Crime

Anglo-Saxon crimes were often things that damaged the community, people's property or threatened the authority of the king. Common crimes included:

- theft
- treason
- murder
- kidnapping
- arson

Question

Explain why arson would be a serious crime during this period.

Arson would be a serious crime in Anglo-Saxon England because...

Enforcement

There was no organised police force in England. Instead, all male members of a tithing were responsible for apprehending criminals. The hue and cry system was used to catch thieves and other criminals. Each man in a tithing was expected to chase a criminal and cheer for others to join the chase. It was a crime not to join in with the hue and cry if you heard another person shouting for assistance. The main responsibility for enforcing the law lay with Reeves and their Reeves (Sheriffs) who would keep order in a hundred or entire shire. Captured criminals would be sent to the local lord for judgement and punishment at a Manor Court. The most serious crimes would be heard by the king.
