

Genes Mendel's 2nd Law

Introduction: This laboratory investigates a monohybrid cross between two pea plants of different colors. The two different genes each produce eggs and sperm of the following genotypes and the complete cross is shown in Table 1 below.

There are two gene phenotypes in the above set of genetic cross. Purple (P) is purple (p). These two gene phenotypes are produced by the following pair of heterozygous genes (P & p) located on two pairs of homologous chromosomes. Each generation repeats independently.

	P	p
P	PP	Pp
p	Pp	pp

These are the top of the pea:

Table 1 shows a monohybrid cross between two heterozygous parents (P & p). The combination of two genes can occur during the egg and sperm formation. The combination of genes that is most frequent is heterozygous (Pp) and the other is that there will be no dominant for color inheritance. The 3:1 phenotypic ratio in the offspring is based on the 1:1:1:1 ratio of the gametes produced by the Pp parent (P & p).
