

MONOHYBRID powerUP sparks

A monohybrid cross is a cross that involves just one trait. For example, the eye color of fruit flies might be passed from parents to their offspring. To show the possible combinations of genes (called alleles) that can be passed on to the offspring, we use Punnett squares. It is like a four-sided coin toss.

Genotype and phenotype help explain how traits are passed from parents to offspring. A genotype is the combination of genes an organism has – for example, TT, Tt, or tt – and a phenotype is what is visible. For example, for seeds, a genotype is what we see on the outside, but the alleles in those plants, based on the genotype, control the way that information is all being shared that decide how the trait will be expressed. Some genes have dominant alleles, which always show up in the phenotype, and recessive alleles, which only show up if both alleles are recessive.

Example: Two heterozygous golden retrievers (Gg) are crossed

	G	g
G	GG	Gg
g	Gg	gg

1. Look at the combinations in the boxes. The possible genotypes for the offspring are:

- GG - One trait
- Gg - One trait
- Gg - One trait
- gg - Two traits

2. Now, figure out what traits the offspring will show based on their genes.

- GG = Puppies with high golden fur (dominant dominant)
- Gg = Puppies with regular golden fur (dominant)
- Gg = Puppies with regular golden fur (dominant)
- gg = Puppies with dark colored fur (recessive recessive)

MONOHYBRID powerUP sparks

A monohybrid cross is a cross that involves just one trait. For example, the eye color of fruit flies might be passed from parents to their offspring. To show the possible combinations of genes (called alleles) that can be passed on to the offspring, we use Punnett squares. It is like a four-sided coin toss.

A gene is a chunk of information that decides a trait, but the color of that chunk (what gene carries) is different called alleles, which can be dominant or recessive. A dominant allele always shows up in the trait's expression, while a recessive allele only shows up if both alleles are recessive. If an organism has two of the same allele for a trait, the trait is a homozygote. If it has two different alleles, the trait is a heterozygote.

Example: Two heterozygous golden retrievers (Gg) are crossed

The two parents are heterozygous golden retrievers. The possible genotypes for the offspring are GG for the golden fur and one dominant gene (G) for the light colored fur, the heterozygous genotype (Gg) for the light

The parent's genes:
Gg across the top of the board

	G	g
G	GG	Gg
g	Gg	gg

and the other parent's genes (Gg) down the left side of the board:

- Now, combine the genes from the top with the genes from the left to make the:
- The top-left: Golden G (from the top) with G (from the left) = Golden Gg
 - The top-right: Golden G (from the top) with g (from the left) = Golden Gg
 - The bottom-left: Golden g (from the top) with G (from the left) = Golden Gg
 - The bottom-right: Golden g (from the top) with g (from the left) = Golden gg
