Statistics and ethics in medical research

VIII—Improving the quality of statistics in medical journals

DOUGLAS G ALTMAN

Publication of a paper implies that the work is both sound and worth while. As I pointed out in my first article, it bestows both respectability and credibility on the work—a "seal of approval." Once a paper has been published the results may influence both medical practice and further research by other scientists, and if the subject is of general interest the "mass media" may report the findings.

The ultimate responsibility for the general standard of published research rests with the medical journals. Perhaps unwillingly, the journals have the rôle of guardians of quality. This is particularly important with regard to statistical methods, which the majority of readers of medical papers are not able to judge for themselves and so must take on trust. The system of appraisal by independent referees is not ideal, but it is probably the most practical method of quality control. Referees are usually selected, however, for their expertise in the relevant medical topic; their ability to assess the statistical aspects is left somewhat to chance. The result is that the statistical methods used in many research papers do not receive adequate scrutiny, with the consequences described in the previous articles.

The poor quality of statistics in published papers has been a cause of concern for many years, and is not confined to medical research. In 1964 Yates and Healy¹ wrote: "It is depressing to find how much good biological work is in danger of being wasted through incompetent and misleading analysis of numerical results." Concern should be particularly great in the medical field because of the ethical implications, but the medical journals have generally been slow to appreciate that the statistical aspects can be fundamental to the validity of research.

Statistics in medical papers

Probably as a reflection of widespread unease, there have been several reviews of the quality of statistics in published papers
