ABSTRACTION

This study looked at how different music tempos affect tomato plant growth. Plants were split into three groups: control (no music), slow music (60 bpm), and fast music (120 bpm).

MATERIALS	STEPS	METHODS
30 tomato plants of the same variety	1	Tomato plants were divided into three groups: control, slow music (60 bpm), and fast music (120 bpm).
3 containers filled with equal amounts of potting soil	2	Each group of 10 plants was planted in one of the containers with equal amounts of potting soil.
Fertilizer solution	3	All groups received the same amount of water and fertilizer solution daily.
Measuring tape	4	The slow music and fast music groups listened to their respective music for 6 hours daily for four weeks.

RESULT

Music tempo can subtly affect plant growth, possibly due to the calming effect of slower tempos. Further research with a larger sample size and longer observation period is needed to confirm these findings and explore underlying mechanisms.

CONCLUSION

This experiment suggests that slow music exposure might lead to slightly enhanced growth in tomato plants compared to no music or fast music exposure. Further research is necessary to solidify these findings and elucidate the biological mechanisms involved.
