

MARINE BIOLOGY - SQUID DISSECTION LAB

Adapted by Anne Maben from HMSS Living Ocean text

INTRODUCTION:

The cephalopods include squid, octopus, cuttlefish, and nautilus. The class name, CEPHALOPODA, meaning "head-foot," aptly describes this group. The foot in this group has specialized by dividing into arms, which are attached to the head. Most cephalopods do not have external shells. The squid has an internal remnant of a shell, called a pen, that looks like a sheet of thick plastic. This long, thin shell helps support the body. The cuttlefish, a close relative of the squid, has a harder, more brittle plate, called a cuttlebone. A cuttlebone is made of calcium carbonate (CaCO_3) secreted by the animal; in composition it is similar to the shells of other mollusks. Gas moving in and out of chambers in the cuttlebone lets the cuttlefish move up and down in the water. Cuttlebones are often put in bird cages for the bird to peck on, sharpen its beak, and eat the calcium, a necessary nutrient.

In the mouth of the squid is a beak shaped much like the beak of a parrot. The beak is not part of the shell but a separate, tooth-like structure. When a squid catches prey, such as a fish, it bites off and swallows chunks of it. The squid has a small radula but it uses it only to pull in chunks of food past the beak.

Cephalopods are also masters of camouflage, using pigment in their skin cells to quickly change its skin color to blend into its surroundings. These skin cells, called chromatophores, contain an elastic sac filled with pigment. The cells are attached to a set of muscle cells. When the muscle cells contract, they pull the chromatophore out flat, spreading the pigment over a larger area and making the skin darker. When the chromatophore is smaller, the skin is lighter. The cells can change shape very rapidly, producing a pulsating patterns of complex color changes. Cephalopods use chromatophores to communicate their moods to others - bright red for anger or passion; white for fear. Pelagic squid even have bioluminescent chromatophore on their ventral side, which they can change the light intensity of to match the light from the ocean's surface (making them invisible to predators below.) The highly intelligent cuttlefish appear to use chromatophores as a visual language: between their fellows, a language humans have yet to decipher.

In cephalopods, the primary swimming organ is the muscular mantle, which forms a chamber that opens to take in seawater. When the mantle closes forcefully, seawater ejected through the siphon jet-propels the animal in short bursts. Squids and cuttlefish change course by quickly redirecting their siphon. They steer by pressing their arms together. They can speedily elude an attacking predator. They can also squirt ink from the ink sac into the water, creating an ink cloud for camouflage and confusing the predator. The squid or cuttlefish can also wave their paddle-shaped fins to move slowly forward or backward. The fins also aid the squid in steering and in stabilizing their movements.

Most cephalopods are relatively small. The giant squid, the largest of invertebrates, reaches lengths of 15 m. It is the favorite prey of sperm whales and the basis for many myths about sea monsters.
