

A Prime Example of Africa: The African Wild Dog

The African wild dog, also called the painted wolf, is one of the world's most-endangered species, boasting a population of only 1,400 individuals (World Wildlife Fund, n.d.-a). Many African animals are endangered for a few reasons, with poaching being one of the main contributors to the animal's dwindling species. However, the question of what characteristics animals in Africa possess is widely unknown among most people. There are a number of attributes that are common to certain animals from the same continent, and this is no different with Africa. The African wild-dog is a prime example of the traits of African wildlife due to their endangered status, tendency to live in social groups, and large roaming area, which are common features among African animals.

To illustrate, the African wild dog is representative of Africa's wildlife because they are endangered, which is customary among African animals; rhinos, leopards, gorillas, elephants, and even more animals are endangered in Africa (World Wildlife Fund, n.d.-b). Like most of the African animals, African wild dogs need large roaming areas which are slowly being encroached on by humans. The destruction of their habitat affects not only the African wild-dog, but other species as well. Wildlife ACT (2018, para. 2) states, "The reasons for endangered status include extreme sensitivity to habitat fragmentation as a consequence of wide-ranging behaviour; conflict with livestock and game farmers; accidental killing by humans and road accidents; and infectious disease." Most African animals face the same issues as African wild dogs face with humans in one way or another. The world is over-explores the lives of all African animals, decreasing populations so much that these animals are now considered endangered. Being endangered isn't the only reason why that the African wild dog represents for all African animals, however

Another feature that is shared between African wild dogs and most African animals is
