

Chapter 3

Systems Design: Job-Order Costing

Solutions to Questions

3-1 By definition, overhead consists of costs that cannot practically be traced to products or jobs. Therefore, if they are to be assigned to products or jobs, overhead costs must be allocated rather than traced.

3-2 Job-order costing is used in situations where many different products or services are produced each period. Each product (or job) is different from all others and requires separate costing. Process costing is used in situations where a single, homogeneous product, such as cement, bricks, or gasoline, is produced for long periods.

3-3 The job cost sheet is used to record all costs that are assigned to a particular job. These costs include direct materials costs traced to the job, direct labor costs traced to the job, and manufacturing overhead costs applied to the job. When a job is completed, the job cost sheet is used to compute the unit product cost. The job cost sheet is also a control document for: (1) determining how many units have been sold and determining the cost of these units; and (2) determining how many units are still in inventory at the end of a period and determining the cost of these units on the balance sheet.

3-4 A predetermined overhead rate is used to apply overhead to jobs. It is computed before a period begins by dividing the period's estimated total manufacturing overhead by the period's estimated total amount in the allocation base. Thereafter, overhead is applied to jobs by multiplying the predetermined overhead rate by the actual amount of the allocation base that is incurred for each job. The most common allocation base is direct labor-hours.

3-5 A sales order is issued after an agreement has been reached with a customer on quan-

ties, prices, and shipment dates for goods. The sales order forms the basis for the production order. The production order specifies what is to be produced and forms the basis for the job cost sheet. The job cost sheet, in turn, is used to summarize the various production costs incurred to complete the job. These costs are entered on the job cost sheet from materials requisition forms, direct labor time tickets, and overhead application computations.

3-6 Many production costs cannot be traced to a particular product or job, but rather are incurred as a result of overall production activities. Therefore, to be assigned to products, such costs must be allocated to the products in some manner. Examples of such costs include utilities, maintenance on machines, and depreciation of the factory building. These costs are indirect production costs.

3-7 If actual manufacturing overhead cost is applied to jobs, then the company must wait until the end of the accounting period to apply overhead and to cost jobs. If the company computes the actual overhead rates more frequently to get around this problem, the rates may fluctuate widely. Overhead cost tends to be incurred somewhat evenly from month to month (due to the presence of fixed costs), whereas production activity often fluctuates. The result would be high overhead rates in periods with low activity and low overhead rates in periods with high activity. For these reasons, most companies use predetermined overhead rates to apply overhead cost to jobs.

3-8 The measure of activity used as the allocation base should drive the overhead cost; that is, the base should cause the overhead cost. If the allocation base does not really cause the overhead, then costs will be incorrectly attributed
