Community Interactions

Reading Passage

Read the passage carefully before answering the questions that follow.

Communities within ecosystems are structured by the interactions among species, which can be positive, negative, or neutral. These interactions include competition for resources, mutualism where both species benefit, predation where one species hunts another, and parasitism where one benefits at the expense of its host. Facilitation occurs when one species promotes the success of another without direct contact, while niche partitioning reduces competition by dividing resources or habitats.

These interactions can influence the diversity and stability of communities. For example, keystone species like sea otters play a crucial role by controlling prey populations such as sea urchins, which allows kelp forests to flourish. Similarly, pollinators such as bees form networks that support plant reproduction. The introduction of non-native species can disrupt these networks, leading to declines in native species and affecting ecosystem functions. Disturbance regimes, such as storms or human activities, further influence community composition by favoring some species over others. Understanding these complex networks helps ecologists predict how communities respond to environmental changes and interventions.

Overall, interactions like predation and mutualism are vital for maintaining ecosystem stability, while facilitation and niche partitioning promote diversity by reducing direct competition. Examples like the sea otter-kelp forest system and pollinator networks illustrate how species relationships shape ecological communities and their functional resilience amidst disturbances.
