Mathematical Autobiography

If I was to describe mathematics I would describe it as using numbers to solve problems. I know that is a very vague description, but to me math itself to me is very vague. Ever since I started learning math I found it to be very difficult. To this day I still do not understand how to do percentages and struggle with fractions. I have always had a dislike for math as I can remember.

I have the very distinct memory of being taught long division in elementary school and while trying to learn the equations I started to cry because it was so hard for me to understand. I have always wanted to understand and be good at math but it is just very difficult for me to grasp. I feel like I have always had this dislike for math because I hate being told that I am wrong. With math I feel like there is only one answer and everything else was wrong. In my case I could never get the right answer and therefore felt like a failure at math.

In middle and high school my dislike for math turned into hate. I had a very hard Algebra professor in high school. She was a veteran from the military and loved using strict guidelines in class. She enforced the need to get the right answer and anything other than the answer was considered wrong. We would go around the room and read off our answers to the homework and if you got the answer wrong you would have to do it out the work on the board in front of the whole class. I found myself often getting the answers on the homework wrong and I would always have to go up to the board and work out the problem in front of the class which I found to be very embarrassing. I literally felt anxious whenever I even thought of going into that class.
